When necessary because of budgetary or other constraints, admission to a graduate program and the University reserves the right to restrict enrollments to minimum admission requirements as set forth by the graduate faculty. The Dean is to offer admission to those applicants meeting the minimum criteria of general academic preparedness, national origin, disability, age, or religion. The Dean is also to offer admission to those applicants who have demonstrated a strong likelihood of success in their selected curriculum. Keeping the above considerations in mind, the graduate faculty will determine the number of applicants who will be accepted for the year.

The University considers all applicants without regard to race, color, sex, sexual orientation, or national origin, but it reserves the right to restrict enrollment to those applicants meeting the minimum criteria of general academic preparedness, national origin, disability, age, or religion. The Dean will determine the number of applicants who will be accepted for the year.

In those cases, the Graduate School will assess its ability to provide educational opportunities to specific populations. In those cases, the Graduate School will determine the number of applicants who will be accepted for the year.

The Graduate School will also consider the following factors in its decisions:

1. The student's academic record and background;
2. The student's work experience and professional references;
3. The student's potential for success in the graduate program;
4. The student's ability to contribute to the diversity of the graduate student population.

The new policy could be:

When the Dean believes that the student's academic record and background are not sufficient to meet the University's admission requirements, the Dean may offer admission to the student on a conditional basis. The student will be required to meet the University's admission requirements within the specified period of time.

The new policy will be effective immediately.
